TAGORE IN SINGAPORE

a talk by Angela Faye Oon

Rabindranath Tagore's visit to Singapore and the Malay peninsula in 1927 is little-known even amongst Tagore scholars. Why did this extraordinary Bengali polymath – the first Asian to win the Nobel Prize for Literature – decide to embark on a journey through Singapore and Malaya for an entire month? Where were the places he went to, and what did he do when he was here? How was he received by the various local communities and how did he in turn present himself to different audiences? This talk will make use of contemporaneous news and magazine articles, photographs and letters to trace Tagore's route through Singapore and the Federated Malay States.

More than simply nugget trivia about Tagore, however, his visit also provides important insights into the social and political milieu of interwar colonial Singapore and Malaya. The talk will explore the different reactions his visit engendered among the Indian, Chinese and European communities, all illuminating the nascent notions of nationalism of the period. In particular, it will investigate an important controversy that Tagore unexpectedly found himself mired in during his trip, arising out of anti-colonial comments that he supposedly made to a Shanghainese newspaper earlier. The incident aroused
